COMMUNITY NEWS

All parents and caregivers of children with a disability are being invited to have their say about a new parenting support project led by the University of Sydney's Professor Stewart Einfeld.

From early 2015, free Stepping Stones Triple P programs will be available for parents and caregivers of children with a disability or developmental delay through the Stepping Stones Triple P (SSTP) Project. The evidence-based Stepping Stones programs are specially tailored for families of children with a disability and introduce a range of strategies to encourage positive behaviour, new skill development, and help to manage more challenging behaviour. The programs will be rolled out across NSW over a two year period.

To start the project, every NSW parent or caregiver of a child with a disability or developmental delay, aged 2 to 10 years, is invited to share their story via an online survey. Have your say by telling the research team what highlights and challenges your family experiences, what parenting support you need, and how the research team can help. Your views will be used to plan the roll out of parenting programs.

Visit www.mysay.org.au to fill in the survey and register your interest in free parenting support.

For further information, contact the NSW research team at fhs.steppingstones@sydney.edu.au or +61 2 9114 4060. You can also visit and 'like' our Facebook page at <https://www.facebook.com/SteppingStonesTriplePProject>.
